Reflection

I took the template website about me page supplied in a tutorial and modified it to fit the requirements of the task. I created a main home page with some brief filler details, then made other pages which you can navigate to for more information on each topic. I used a nav bar which utilises the router-view to allow the user to navigate around the site. The past experience page uses the html table, which was a requirement of the task. The projects page uses a component which displays information about the project passed to it form the main page. This allows for a changing list of projects to be passed to the component and each have their details rendered in the same format. I used a form to allow the user to send a request directly to me, allowing them to request information on hiring me for a project.

I modified the css supplied to make a theme which I thought looked ok, but to be honest it is not that nice looking, but I'm not the best with design. I made the page responsive, so when the display size reaches around 800px, the layout goes from horizontal to vertical, allowing a better user experience. I also made some of the elements transition to a larger size when hovered to allow easier reading. Some of the css is set within the base.css file, while page specific stylings are set within the individual page layouts.

I used router-view to navigate between the pages, vmodels for the form to display hint text, and vfor to create a list of previous projects. I also created a component to display the previous projects within the same template style.

Does the site look that good? Do the elements work well together? No not really, but they show the requirements of the task so I put them in.
